SUMMARY: The business of love and the love of business are the same thing. Both are necessary ingredients for relationships.

While socialists promote donations without productivity and capitalists promote profits without care, the reality is that productivity ought to go hand-in-hand for both the giver and the receiver.

The business of love is when you do things for others at your own cost (charity).

The love of business is when you do things for others at their own cost (profit).

Since we must love ourselves as much as we love our neighbours, there must be a balance between give and take. Unlike the silly giving ideas promoted by beggar governments, churches, media, schools and literal beggars, love is a two-way channel of giving and receiving.

Giving without receiving is the injustice of foolishness, hypocrisy and suicide.

Receiving without giving is the injustice of thievery, selfishness and greed.

Nature's laws strive for the justice of balance. Every healthy relationship is a see-saw of give and take actions. If we really are friends, we would do business with each other rather than beg from each other.

Even in marital relationships, there is a give and take relationship; after all, the word economics literally means home management (ecology and ecosystem). A relationship that does not balance its economic needs is an unhealthy relationship and it will eventually strain itself to breaking point.

A business with no wo/man is a better option than a wo/man with no business!
